JUNK FOR SALE

WINDY WEASEL was a terrific salesman. He could sell *any*body *any*thing! Once, for instance, he had found an orange peel on the ground.

"For ten cents," said Windy to the first passerby, who happened to be Steve Squirrel, "I will sell you this magnificent good-luck token."

"Ha ha ha!" Steve had laughed. "That's nothing but a rotten old beat-up orange peel."

Then Windy had gone into his sales routine: "My dear sir, could it be that you are the only animal in all this land who has never heard of the amazing power of the orange peel . . . oh, not a plain *ord*inary orange peel, sir, but a peel like this one, a peel which has matured in a clover patch. This orange peel, my good fellow, has been lying in clover, right here on the ground, for at least two weeks, as can easily be told by the condition that it's in. What was that word you used? Rotten? Yes. Well sir, orange peels, when in long contact with clover, receive a magic power which can bring their fortunate owners the very finest of good luck. Now ordinarily, sir, I would charge, for this wonderful good-luck token here, I would charge at least a quarter, but, sir, seeing as how you have such a kind face, I will do you a favor and sell you this token for the mere dime I mentioned, even though it is, of course, worth far more. Keep it close to you at all times, sir, and good luck will surely—"

"Oh, all right!" Steve had given in, just like everybody always gave in to Windy's salesmanship. "I'll buy it." And he did, while Windy scooted off with the dime he'd made so easily, chuckling to himself, "Ha ha ha! Ten cents for a rotten old beat-up orange peel! Ha ha ha!"

One day all the animals in the woods decided to get even with Windy Weasel. Steve's orange peel had turned out to be no good luck at all. It was absolutely worthless, of course. So was Richard Robin's triangular pebble, that Windy had sold him for five cents. Timmy Tortoise's thorny rose-stem, which Windy had sold him for twenty cents, was worthless. So was the broken old bicycle handlebar that Windy had sold to Benny Bunny for fifty cents. So the animals made a plan, and when Windy came along, he fell for it. . . .

"I want it!" shouted Richard Robin, paying no attention to Windy at all. "I want it!" Timmy Tortoise shouted. And Richard, Timmy, Benny, and Steve all grabbed at an object, trying to get it away from each other, and screaming that it belonged to them.

Finally Windy Weasel calmed them down enough so that he could ask, "What is it you're fighting over?"

They all pointed to a trash can cover. Windy said, "You all want that junky old thing?"

"Junky old thing, my foot!" Steve Squirrel said. "This just happens to be the silver shield held by King James the Second in the War of 1344. It's a valuable antique!"

Sure enough, the trick that Windy had pulled so often on them was now the trick they pulled on him, and it worked! "How much you want for it?" he asked.

A moment later, as Windy walked off with his trash can cover, the others divided the ninety cents between them. "He's not the only salesman around here!" they laughed.
